Why You Shouldn't Fear Bear Markets (/blog/why-you-shouldn-t-fear-bear-markets-0)

If you've been listening to the financial media of late you have no doubt heard some experts prognosticating on the prospect of the next big bear market. Unquestionably, the stock market is at another crossroads that belies the concerns that most people have over the global economy. Even if their predictions are correct, should we be at all concerned? In the overall scheme of things, should we fear bear markets?

Accounting For How Your Longevity Compounds the Inflation Risk of Your Retirement Income (/blog/accounting-how-your-longevity-compounds-inflation-risk-your-retirement-income)

It has only been since the Baby Boomer generation began to cross the retirement threshold that we've had to seriously confront the new challenge of our longevity. Although most of us are now bracing for the probability of living 20 to 30 years in retirement (nearly double the retirement life spans of our grandparents), what isn't quite as clear is that our actual longevity is a moving target. That is, the older we get, our life expectancy increases, and that can have serious implications for the way we plan for our retirement income.
